Google Uses Blacklists, Lied to Congress, Says Whistleblower The Jim Rutt Show with Zachary Vorhies

"Senior Google executives perjured themselves before Congress," says Google whistleblower Zachary "Zach" Vorhies on a special edition of The Jim Rutt Show. Last week, Vorhies uploaded a large cache of documents to Project Veritas including a "YouTube query blacklist" of terms that he says are penalized in YouTube search results. This week, he gave an exclusive interview to Jim Rutt, host of the new science and technology podcast, The Jim Rutt Show.

Zach Vorhies worked as a senior software engineer at YouTube since 2008, up until he blew the whistle on what he claims to be Google's use of "Machine Learning Fairness" to bias Google AutoComplete suggestions and search results from Google Search, Google News, and YouTube.

Vorhies says things changed at Google after the November 2016 U.S. Presidential election. He points to a video of Google executives leaked to Brietbart News that appears to show disbelief over the election results as the first sign.

Vorhies says Google is using AutoComplete bias to "program people like us," Google and YouTube site users, with a machine-driven, iterative process of correcting searches and search results to push users into not asking certain questions or looking at blacklisted material. Vorhies says users can spot the bias themselves by comparing Google's AutoComplete suggestions with actual search patterns at Trends.Google.com, the company's own record of how often terms are searched for.

Vorhies accuses Google's management of intentionally interfering in U.S. elections and in elections around the world through distortion of search and AutoComplete. He says Google may have used a known security flaw to shut down U.S. Presidential candidate Tulsi Gabbard's Gmail account, resulting in lost views and donations after a televised debate appearance.

Vorhies ties many of his claims to specific documents in the cache of documents he has made publicly available. The Jim Rutt Show has not verified Vorhies' claims with respect to those documents.
